

THE CHALLENGE

Managing studies across multiple countries can be a headache when it comes to country-specific requirements. Each country can have different rules and regulations, not to mention differences in cultural business norms. Considering the global nature of today's clinical trials, it's impossible for every person to know everything about every country. Pharmica was approached by a client that was looking for a way to catalog its organizational knowledge in a centralized and easily accessible fashion so employees would have a definitive source of this crucial information.

HOW PHARMICA HELPED

It was clear that several categories of information varied from country to country, including those vital GxP areas of clinical, regulatory, and safety. After collecting and categorizing this vast body of corporate knowledge, Pharmica honed in on a solution: a dynamic form, broken down into specific functional areas, streamlining the collection of country-specific information and storing it in a central location. Finally, a procedure was developed to help collect and classify this information, making sure to capture relevant information related to these country-specific categories.

LASTING RESULTS & RELATIONSHIPS

With the Pharmica solution in place, anyone working with an unfamiliar country could now simply browse to the form for that country and have the information readily available within seconds. This process was designed to be flexible and efficient, allowing users to update information or add further detail over time. This frees up study teams to focus on their work, rather than wasting time searching for information or, worse, having to redo or resubmit country-specific documents, thus causing study delays.

When it comes to implementing technology, “build it and they will come” only works in the movies. At Pharmica we understand the delicate balance which must be managed when you bring a new tool in house. We help our clients work through tradeoffs in how and when it makes sense to change the tools and when to tweak how you're working with them. With Pharmica, when it comes time to “Go Live” you can breathe easy knowing you'll get the results you dreamt of.